THE NEXT TIME you hear someone say the government can end unemployment by creating jobs, consider this: There is a better way.

When the government creates "make-work" jobs it also creates more spending without a corresponding increase in production of goods and services that people really need. Shortages develop. Prices go up. So do taxes in order to pay for the artificial jobs.

There is a way to do it without inflation or higher taxes. The Gross National Product (GNP) is the total value of all the goods and services produced in this country. When the GNP increases more slowly than the increase in the labor force, the employment levels and our standard of living go down. If the GNP increases faster than the labor force, employment goes up and so does our standard of living.

The secret is getting the GNP to grow as fast or faster than the labor force. That can be done by developing more growth capital which results in more job opportunities. Make it more profitable for people to invest their money.

One way would be to give the individual stockholder a tax break. We already tax corporation profits before dividends are paid. Why not exempt them from personal income tax where they are now taxed the second time. This would bring the small investor back to the stock market. Another way is to give tax credits to corporations who plow profits back into the company's capital improvements.

These suggestions would not saddle the average worker with the higher taxes and runaway inflation caused by government created jobs that don't add to the growth of the GNP. They would create productive jobs and keep shortages and prices down.

So the next time you hear someone say the government can end unemployment by creating jobs—set 'em straight!
